Our Tientsin contemporary has recently taken upon itself to prove that Chinese com- port. mercial morality is in advance of the European article. The object seems to be to work in the following incident :- A rich man of the writer's acquaintance, pious, leader in philanthropic movements of various kinds, as Aborigines, "C. D.," and Opium, and that sort of thing, and M.P., had a young relative in China who had gone to the dogs. The rich man wanted very much to get his erring relative home, and offered to pay all purchased a furm near that city. Yet Stephen's eye-the eye of a Davy?" sailor accustomed to the darkness of the sea at night-could descry something that lay to the north. The Irish packet had disappeared. Yes, her sails were now gone. But out at sea-far beout, half a league away-what black thing was there? Oh, it must be a cloud, that was all; island?" and no doubt a storm was brewing. Yet no. it was looming larger and larger, and coming nearer and nearer. It was a sail. Stephen could see it plainly enough now against the leaden sky. It was a schooner; he could make out its two masts, with fore and aft sails, and its square yards forward. It was an Irish schooner; he could recognise its heavy hull and hollowed out water. It was tacking against wind and tide from the north-east; it was a Dublin schooner and was homeward bound from Iceland, having it's clane gone at me; but it's one of the lot in called at Whitchaven and being about to put in

All at once his late troubles lay back in his mind, and by a sort of unconscious mechanical habit of intellect he began to put familiar ideas together. This schooner that was coming from Iceland would be heavy laden; it would have whalebone, and eider-down, and tallow. If it ran ashore and was wrecked some of this cargo might be taken by someone and sold for something to a French smuggler that lay outside the Chicken Rocks. That lamp on the Point of Ayro was the only sea-light on this north coast of the island, and it hung by a rope from a pole. The land lay low about it, there was not a house on that sandy headland for miles on miles and the night was very dark. All this came up to Stephen Orry's mind by no caller of will; to looked out of his dell eyes on the dull stream of sea and sky, and the thoughts were there of themselves, What power outside himself was at work with him? Did anything tell him that this was the great moment of his life-that his destiny hung on it—that the ordeal he had just gone through was as nothing to the ordeal that was yet before darkness at the black shadow on the horizon, did then a strange thing had happened.
